The Kierkegaardian Paradox: An Exploration of Post-Modern Existentialism. □ The supreme paradox of all thought is the attempt to discover something that thought cannot think. Kierkegaard's Concept of Paradox of faith. Kierkegaard's concept of paradox of faith is closely associated with his concept of absurd (often the two denote the same meaning in Kierkegaard's writings). A paradox for Kierkegaard is a situation in which two opposite values or views collide. Faith, for example, is a paradox to Kierkegaard since it favors the individual over the universal, while (Hegelian) ethics says the opposite.

The paradox of Abraham is that the believer acts and risks much on less than complete knowledge (incomplete knowledge is not sufficient for faith for Kierkegaard; one must believe by virtue of the absurd, that is to say because something is a contradiction).

Kierkegaard introduces the idea of the paradox and the leap in Fear and Trembling. He says, "The act of resignation does not require faith, for what I gain is my eternal consciousness. This is a purely philosophical movement that I venture to make when it is demanded and can discipline myself to make, because every time some finitude will take power over me, I starve myself into submission until I make the movement, for my eternal consciousness is my love for God, and for me that is the ...

Kierkegaard's paradoxical vision of religious diversity, says Connell, allows for both respectful coexistence with people of different faiths and authentic commitment to one's own faith.
