It seems that Ashford is becoming more popular in the fictional world as the quiet, romance-book filled life of Sarah Smith, owner of the bookshop near the Gingerbread Café (on the corner in fact) collides with New York City journalist Ridge. Ridge has come from the big city to do an article of Ashford.

The title is a bit misleading, as the "bookshop" is actually mobile. The main character is interesting, especially as she explores life in rural northern Scotland. The book refers to many other books, which added to its appeal. Most of those are real books, although a few exist only in the author's imagination.
